About the Conference

This international conference provides a vibrant platform to bridge these epistemological traditions. It recognizes that ecological sustainability is not merely a technical metric of carbon equivalents or resource efficiency, but a profoundly human problem bound to questions of justice, narrative, culture, and governance. By situating ecological science alongside literary ecocriticism, philosophy, indigenous wisdom, environmental jurisprudence, and emerging technologies (including computational ecology, GIS mapping, green energy systems, and AI-driven resource modeling), the conference fosters actionable dialogue on how societies can navigate contemporary climate realities. This conference welcomes academicians, scientists, literary scholars, environmental engineers, legal practitioners, policy planners, and research scholars. By convening thinkers across disparate traditions, the forum seeks to move beyond abstract theory toward an integrated blueprint for resilient coexistence. Ultimately, it challenges participants to reimagine our collective planetary future affirming that sustainable societal transformation emerges only when technological innovation and scientific inquiry are grounded in ethical consciousness and humanistic understanding.
